SIXTEENTH YEAR. VOL. XV, NO. 6.

IS EASTERN CAPITAL NEEDED?

There is an almost endless variety of financial and economical fallacies, and the more ignorant men are of practical principles of finance and business, the more dogmatic are they in proclaiming their false theories. Examples are frequent and have been for a year or so. Recently a third party leader declared "that we want no more eastern capital in Kansas," that "we don't want to borrow money from the millionaires of New York and Boston." And this person pretends to represent the workingmen.

It is not easy to understand how a man of ordinary intelligence can accept and advocate a theory of this kind. The absurdity of trying to build up a new country without the aid of outside capital is so obvious that the man who cannot see it is hopelessly blind and stupid. What would Hutchinson amount to if no eastern capital had been invested here? What would any western city amount to if it had rejected eastern capital? When the best portion of Chicago was destroyed by fire in 1871 it was chiefly eastern capital that rebuilt that city. It was the millionaires of New York and Boston and other eastern cities, and the savings institutions and trust companies of the east, that came forward with their money and replaced what had been swept away, making Chicago greater and more prosperous than before. It was from these sources that Omaha, Minneapolis and Kansas City found the means of development. The great business buildings of Hutchinson were constructed almost wholly with outside capital, and it was from eastern capitalists and financial institutions that was obtained the money to build waterworks, construct street railways and erect electric light plants. The bonds by which we were enabled to pay for our public school buildings and carry out other improvements were purchased by eastern capital and could not have been sold elsewhere, at any rate on terms as favorable to the city. The great packing industry of Hutchinson is largely backed by Chicago capital. In short, here as elsewhere throughout the west, every important enterprise and public improvement requiring the expenditure of large sums of money, has been compelled to go to the financial centers of the east to obtain the needed capital.

Kansas, in common with the entire west, must continue for years to come to depend largely upon eastern capital for development. The money is not here and will not be until our resources are fully developed and the accumulation of capital is in excess of immediate demands. Before we can be independent of the millionaires of New York and Boston we must earn the money, and in order to do that industries must be established, enterprises set on foot and greater opportunities for the employment of labor afforded to all working men. Kansas should add largely to her manufactures during the next few years, and there is reason to believe she will do so, but local capital can play but a small part in developing a city in this direction. Irrigation in the western portion of Kansas and other western states cannot be accomplished without outside capital and a great deal of it. The development of our great mineral resources including the tin mines of the Black Hills, can only be effected by drawing capital not only from the east, but from foreign lands. Thus it is that the west must have eastern capital, and it is of the highest importance to this state that distrust be removed from the minds of capitalists, and confidence in the integrity of our people restored. The time may not be far distant when lower rates of interest will prevail. But in any event it is supreme folly to rail against eastern capital and expect to build up and develop Kansas and her resources without drawing upon the accumulated wealth of older and more fully developed communities.—Hutchinson News.
